I think the information on foods should all be meaningful (thays why its there) and like knowing if a food i am considering buying has been in any way treated with radiation. I dont think any informaed person would have inappropriate anxiety over seeing a clearly marked lable.

I would feel very misled if I didn't know what foods had been treated with radiation due to no lableing, and such I would like to have some type of lable that says if ANY of the ingedients have been treated with radiation. I think that the use of a irradiation lable makes the foodcompany consider what they are doing with that food before it reaches my table.

I did not recognize that logo to mean irradiation treated foods, I also dont recall ever seeing that lable on any of the foods i currently purchase.

I dont think that the warning should expire because I as the "consumer" should know what is being done with my food.

Thank You,
